Working in HR has brought a realization that we all have the same struggles and concerns. All employees have pieces of their lives that are intense and require attention. No one is immune to health, family, relationship, financial and emotional challenges. HR has taught me how to be a human. We try our best to deal with each employee the way they want to be treated, bringing an awareness of our own humanity and flaws to the table when we interact. Most interactions are extremely personal, and giving room for an employee to be human and to allow grace is often the charge of HR while also being charged with the tasks of delivering unsettling news to employees. An HR professional is at all times cognizant and aware that they are carrying the organization's mission while striving to guide employees into success in their career.
